of oranges, but he did not like that he and his family ate oranges all the time. Sometimes, he wanted to avoid them for weeks at a time.

He wished his family could grow other things, like corn.

"Mom, why do we have to have oranges almost every day?" Harry asked.

"Well, since we grow them, there are plenty around," his mom replied.

"Does every kid eat as many oranges as we do?" he asked.

"No, definitely not. There are parts of the country and parts of the world that don't have the type of weather that oranges grow in. We're actually very lucky!"

"So some kids don't eat oranges at all?"

"We actually send oranges all over, so that if people can't grow their own oranges, they can still buy them and eat them," said Mom.

"Is that so? People move foods all over the world. I never knew this. What else do people move around like food?" asked Harry.

"Plenty of things. The factories that make your favourite toys are not all in our little town here. The companies make the toys and then send those toys to other places. So food and products move from where they can be grown or made easily to places where they can't be grown or made easily. This is how they are made available around the country and the world."

"Wow! I never thought about where all our food and toys come from. It's very interesting," Harry said.
